

Hi there

LET'S TALK ABOUT DROPPING THE MORNING NAP

Toddlers can be unpredictable and their naps even more so! Typically, around 12-15 months of age, we drop the morning nap. This can be a tricky time and we're here to help navigate this new norm.

Nap time with a one-year-old: a battle worth winning!

These guidelines are for early toddlers who are getting 10-12 hours of nighttime sleep in a row. Keep in mind, this transition takes longer than most. Typically, moving from two naps to one can take up to nine days.

In the span of this long transition, you may be tempted to do the following:

Turn back

Start bedtime early for fussy-pants

Reconsider your decision to have kids

All jokes aside, these are all normal responses to the struggle of the transition. Stick with it because our job is to stay consistent even when they are not. And it will pay off!

Dropping the Morning Nap

What Are Signs My Early Toddler Is Ready to Transition to One Nap a Day?

If your little one is having more bad nap days than good ones for 2 weeks (given that you are using the Moms on Call guidelines).

The afternoon nap has become really unpredictable.

Toddler is getting 10-12 hrs of nighttime sleep in a row.

How Can I Successfully Transition My Early Toddler to One Nap a Day?

They will be tired in the morning when they are used to having naptime.

Plan 9 activities to keep them awake for each morning of the 9 days of transition.

Letting go of the morning nap may be bittersweet, but watching your toddler conquer new milestones is a sweet reward for their growing independence.

For Nap:

Choose a start time between 12-1:30 p.m.

Whatever time you choose becomes the time you start nap each day.

Nap is a minimum of 1.5 hours long, and a maximum of 3 hours.

From the start of naptime, not the start of the time they fell asleep!

Nap is over by 4 p.m. No matter what!

During the designated naptime, they can 'cry, play or sleep'.

If they mostly cry, we can get them up after 1.5 hrs and keep them awake until nighttime.

Then we begin napping at the same time the next day.

This is key; they will begin to sleep more when we keep the time consistent!

Remember those 9 activities you planned for morning nap distraction?

Use those again to get your little to their bedtime.

We are setting the 24 hour clock.

They do not "make-up" for lost sleep. Keep the morning wake-up time, the naptime, and the bedtime solid.

This is not for the faint-hearted, nor is it permanent. You can do this, and so can they!

Before you know it, that beautiful, illusive 2-3 hour predictable afternoon nap will settle into the daily routine. And remember, we all have crazy days where we are running around and losing track of time. It's just real life; we will not ruin it all with extra playtime in the sunshine or a late start to our afternoon. Just try to stay as consistent as possible.

Parenting can be challenging, but you've got this! You are capable, strong, and doing an amazing job raising your little one.
